Dornoch Primary celebrates 100 years

THIS year is the centenary of Dornoch Primary School, which opened in January 1913.

One hundred years later, the school is still home to the Primary and Nursery schools.

Over the course of this year, the school has undertaken many projects to celebrate its centenary.

Earlier in the year, a number of children took part in a knitting session as part of the local Fibre Fest, and this developed into a lunch-time knitting club at the school.

For the summer term, the school undertook an ambitious production of the musical "Oliver" in which all the pupils were able to take part and, at the end of term, the school presented Historylinks Museum with some of the wonderful work that the children had created in celebration.

The museum has created a new section in its "Schools Out" display highlighting this work, so that visitors can appreciate the colourful and creative efforts of the children.

Curator Sue Higgins says: "Please come and visit us and see the display - if you have children or grandchildren who live locally, you may well find something that they did for the celebrations. A folder with more of the children's work can be found in the museum's Reference Section."
